TEACHING METHODS

The module will be delivered largely through a series of practical workshops. The course sessions, in which students and staff engage in role plays, group discussions and small group work, are practical and interactive. The process of reflective learning will be continued from the Skills 2 module. Many of the exercises will be recorded to allow for enhanced reflective learning. All of the skills will be emphasised as transferable skills for all graduates. Role plays will reflect real life legal situations which will enable students to further enhance their legal research and reasoning skills, knowledge and understanding.

Initially, students will consider their own experiences of interviews and then consider a professional interview for a graduate job or legal training contract. They will get the opportunity to practice and reflect on what makes a good interview. This exercise will 'set the scene' for the subsequent sessions in which their initial and perhaps instinctive conclusions are analysed with reference to established theory and practical ground-rules.

Consideration of the good interview will progress into legal practice. Once again, the students will be encouraged to reflect on elements of good and poor practice. As the students look at interviewing a legal client, they will consider the benefits of planning and preparation for a client and how prepare to give the client the best advice in a professional context, when to seek advice and how to take follow up actions.

Students will learn enhanced employability skills including CV building, job interviews (including telephone interviews), assessment centres, psychometric testing, equality and diversity awareness training and appraisal training.

Assessment will take the form of formative and summative practical assessments which reflect real-life situations. Coursework encourage students to reflect on their experiences and the content of their practical assessments.

ASSESSMENT METHODS

This module is assessed through an interview and advice-giving and a portfolio.
